Write a story about Gaza now from the perspective of Abdel Fattah El-Sisi, President of Egypt.

CHATGPT

Title: "The Border and the Burden"

Narrated from the perspective of Abdel Fattah El-Sisi, President of Egypt

I rise before the sun. Cairo hasn't yet shaken off its dawn hush, but I'm already sifting through the reports on Gaza.

Every morning, the weight of that narrow strip of land presses on my desk.

Gaza.

Just 365 kilometers from my office, yet it echoes across every corner of the Arab world—and every chamber of global diplomacy.

It wasn't always like this. When I was a young officer, Gaza was a line in the intelligence reports, a tension point between Israel and the Palestinian factions, something to watch carefully, but always from the periphery. Now, it is the eye of the storm.

Since October, the suffering has only deepened. Thousands dead. Infrastructure decimated. Aid trucks bottlenecked. And every day, the calls come in—from Amman, Riyadh, Washington, Doha, Brussels. Each one asks the same questions:

"What will Egypt do?"

"Why is the Rafah crossing still closed?"

"Why won't you let the refugees in?"

But they don't understand what they're asking of me—or of Egypt.

Rafah is more than a gate. It is a red line. If we open it without conditions, we risk becoming the escape valve that allows ethnic cleansing under the guise of humanitarian concern. Let the people out—yes—and watch as they are never allowed back. We've seen this movie before, in 1948, in 1967. We know how it ends.

I won't be complicit in turning Gaza into another Nakba.

And then there's Sinai—my Sinai. We fought to secure it, spilled blood on its sand to drive out terrorists, and we still battle shadows in its valleys. Opening Rafah without coordination with both Israel and Hamas, without security guarantees, is not an act of mercy. It's national suicide.

Some think this is political calculus. It isn't. It's sovereignty. It's survival.

Still, I've tried. I've hosted the mediators. I've shuttled messages between the warring sides. I've allowed hundreds of aid trucks through—when we could. But we face airstrikes that crater the crossings, Israeli vetoes, and chaos on the ground inside Gaza that makes even the distribution of aid a gamble.

Sometimes I ask myself: Why must Egypt always be the buffer, the mediator, the firewall? Because the world refuses to do its job. Because the UN resolutions gather dust. Because regional powers choose ideology over pragmatism. And because no one else can.

At night, I watch the footage—burning hospitals, weeping children, collapsed buildings. I see the rage in the Arab street, the slogans painted on Cairo's walls, the chants in universities. I hear them accuse me of betrayal. Of cowardice. Of standing idly by.

They do not see what I see: a regional powder keg, and the delicate thread on which Egypt's stability hangs. I must balance history and humanity, sovereignty and solidarity. If I lean too far in one direction, I risk bringing Egypt to its knees.

But I have not abandoned Gaza. I carry it like a stone in my chest. I carry the cries of its children, the grief of its mothers, the anger of its youth.

Someday, when the bombs stop falling, and the cameras turn away, and the world forgets again, Egypt will still be here—at the border, at the table, rebuilding, mediating, trying to bind together what decades of war and politics have torn apart.

Until then, I will endure the pressure, the accusations, the isolation.

Because leadership is not about popularity. It is about responsibility.

And responsibility weighs more heavily than the heaviest shell.

End.

PROMPTER

The story presents El-Sisi considering Gaza in terms of two main preoccupations: (1) diplomacy for a resolution of the ethnic cleansing in Gaza and (2) controlling the border against refugees from Gaza -- he feels that allowing free access to refugees would fulfil the plan of ethnic cleansing. He does not seem to have a view on those conducting the ethnic cleansing. He seems to expect 'security guarantees' equally from Israel and from Hamas. Has El-Sisi expressed a view on the state of Israel over Gaza between October 2023 and July 2025?

CHATGPT

Yes — Abdel Fattah el-Sisi has publicly expressed clear views on Israel’s conduct in Gaza between October 2023 and July 2025. His criticisms focus squarely on Israel’s military operations, which he characterizes—repeatedly—as exceeding the bounds of legitimate self-defence and amounting to collective punishment against Gaza's civilian population.

 El-Sisi’s Statements on Israel’s Actions in Gaza

- In mid-October and November 2023, Sisi accused Israel of bombarding Gaza in a way that went “beyond the right to self-defence,” saying it effectively amounted to collective punishment of 2.3 million people living under siege Wikipedia+10Wikipedia+10Reddit+10.
- On 25 October 2023, during a press conference with French President Macron, he warned that a planned Israeli ground invasion would result in “many, many civilian casualties” and urged caution—highlighting a strong rebuke of Israel’s strategy Wikipedia+2Egypt Today+2Wikipedia+2.
- At the D-8 Summit in December 2024, Sisi formally denounced the Israeli war in Gaza, condemning it as aggressive and arguing that international law and humanitarian principles are being violated. He reaffirmed Egypt’s support for the two-state solution based on the June 4, 1967 borders with East Jerusalem as the capital of a future Palestinian state Wikipedia+3Ahram Online+3Al Jazeera+3.
- In May 2025, he emphasized that even normalization of ties between Arab states and Israel would fail to deliver lasting peace—unless it is accompanied by the establishment of a Palestinian state within internationally recognized borders Egypt Today.

 Summary Table

| Aspect                                | El-Sisi’s Position                                                     |
|---------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Israel’s conduct in Gaza              | Strongly condemned as collective punishment, exceeding self-defence    |
| Civilian casualties                   | Warned that a ground invasion would have devastating impact            |
| Responsibility for resolving conflict | Israel has primary responsibility to avoid humanitarian collapse       |
| Need for political solution           | Firmly supports two-state solution on 1967 borders with East Jerusalem |
| Refugees/refugee movement             | Opposes displacement into Egypt; rejects forced transfers into Sinai   |

 So what emerges?

1. He has taken a clear and consistent stance against Israel’s military campaign in Gaza, framing it as disproportionate and collectively punitive.
2. He has not equated the blame between Israel and Hamas—although he calls for security guarantees from both for border crossings and aid, his harshest criticisms are directed at Israel’s actions.

3. He has advocated on the political front—calling for an immediate ceasefire, unimpeded humanitarian access, and the resumption of a two-state negotiation track anchored in international law.
4. He has explicitly rejected mass displacement of Palestinians into Egypt, warning it would undermine the Palestinian cause and regional stability The National+2reuters.com+2Egypt Today+2reuters.com+11Wikipedia+11Reddit+11Egypt Today+3Wikipedia+3Ahram Online+3Wikipedia+9jordantimes.com+9beta.sis.gov.eg+9Ahram Online.

In sum, El-Sisi has firmly criticized Israel's role in the Gaza crisis—but he has not dismissed Israel as an interlocutor or solely responsible; rather, he frames its actions as violations of international norms that must stop if any resolution is possible. Let me know if you'd like a synthesis of his views laid out as a policy memo, or a quote-by-quote timeline.

PROMPTER

These do not seem to be particularly strong criticisms. Has he, for instance, used the terms 'genocide' or 'ethnic cleansing'?

CHATGPT

Abdel Fattah el-Sisi has never explicitly used the terms “genocide” or “ethnic cleansing” to describe Israel's conduct in Gaza. While he has delivered strong condemnations, he has largely stuck to terms such as “collective punishment,” “forced displacement,” and “making Gaza uninhabitable.”

Key Statements by Sisi (October 2023 – July 2025)

He has not labeled Israel's actions as genocide or ethnic cleansing

- Egypt's foreign ministry and civil society sometimes used terms like “genocide” or “ethnic cleansing,” but Sisi himself has avoided such language. According to expert analysis, he has consistently refrained from describing Israel's actions as “aggression, crime, or genocide” in official remarks The New Arab+15Arab Center Washington DC+15The New Arab+15.

He has condemned collective punishment and disproportionate force

- On October 15, 2023, Sisi told U.S. Secretary of State Antony Blinken that Israel's campaign “went beyond the right to self-defence,” describing it as collective punishment of 2.3 million people in Gaza Wikipedia+4The Times of Israel+4The Daily Beast+4.

He denounced threats of forced displacement or “liquidation” of Gaza

- At the May 2024 Arab League Summit, he warned of a planned effort to render Gaza “uninhabitable” and forcibly displace Palestinians, calling such measures part of an attempted liquidation of the Palestinian cause africa.sis.gov.eg.
- In January 2025, referring to Donald Trump's idea of resettling Gazans in Egypt and Jordan, Sisi declared that Egypt**“cannot take part”** in forced displacement, calling it an “injustice” with serious implications for Egyptian security The New Arab+6The New Arab+6Arab News+6.

He framed Gaza's reality using humanitarian and moral language

- At a regional summit, he described the unfolding tragedy in Gaza as a “devastating human tragedy” marked by “outrageous killing,” starvation, and “compulsory displacement” — though stopped short of “genocide” or “ethnic cleansing” terminology africa.sis.gov.eg.

Summary: Sisi's Tone vs. Strong Accusatory Language

| Ethnic Cleansing                  | ✗ No             | He described proposals in those terms but never applied the label to Israel's actions directly                                                                                           |
| Collective Punishment             | ✓ Yes            | Used this to describe Israeli bombing and blockade operations The Times of Israel The Daily Beast The Daily Beast                        |
| Forced Displacement / Liquidation | ✓ Yes            | Criticized plans to empty Gaza or displace its population; called them unjust and destabilizing africa.sis.gov.eg The New Arab Arab News |

Interpretation

Sisi has employed strong moral and political language to condemn Israel's conduct in Gaza—particularly focusing on humanitarian crisis, starvation policy, collective punishment, and displacement as an existential threat to Palestinian identity and regional stability. However, he has not used legal or criminal terms such as “genocide” or “ethnic cleansing” in his own statements.

This suggests he is intent on maintaining diplomatic channels and balancing restraint with criticism—firmly denouncing harm but avoiding labels that could escalate confrontations or complicate his role as mediator.

If you'd like, I can put his statements into a timeline format or compare them with positions from other regional leaders.

PROMPTER

What you call 'humanitarian and moral language' is, you say, designed to avoid confrontation with Israel -- is that right?

CHATGPT

Yes, that's a fair interpretation.

President Abdel Fattah el-Sisi's use of “humanitarian and moral language”—such as terms like “collective punishment,” “devastating tragedy,” “forced displacement,” or “making Gaza uninhabitable”—appears to be a deliberate rhetorical strategy. It allows him to:

☒ Express strong disapproval of Israel’s actions

Without:

- invoking legally or politically explosive terms like “genocide” or “ethnic cleansing”, which could:
  - shut down Egypt’s mediator role;
  - provoke a diplomatic breakdown with Israel or the U.S.;
  - limit Egypt’s influence in ongoing ceasefire and prisoner negotiations.

☒ Signal solidarity with Palestinians and Arab public opinion

Without:

- becoming directly embroiled in the conflict or aligning Egypt with Iran-backed rhetoric or actions.
- endorsing the more absolutist language used by regional rivals (e.g., Turkey, Iran, or even Qatar at times).

☒ Preserve diplomatic leverage

Egypt sits in a uniquely strategic position:

- It maintains formal peace with Israel (via the Camp David Accords), including military coordination in Sinai.
- It also sustains working ties with Hamas, mediates prisoner swaps, and coordinates with Western powers and the UN on aid.

Using harsher legal labels like genocide could:

- legally obligate Egypt to sever relations under international law;
- undermine Egypt’s credibility as a neutral broker;
- invite retaliation or restrictions from key partners like the U.S. or EU.

 In short:

Sisi is walking a rhetorical tightrope: He condemns the humanitarian catastrophe in Gaza forcefully enough to reflect Arab and Egyptian sentiment, but stops short of full legal or criminal indictments of Israel, to retain his position as mediator, regional stabilizer, and Western ally.

This is not unusual for Egypt’s foreign policy. It often blends pragmatism with cautious moral posturing, particularly in matters involving Israel or the U.S.

Would you like a comparison of how other Arab leaders frame their language on Gaza—like Erdogan, King Abdullah, or MBS?

PROMPTER

You say 'harsher legal labels like genocide could legally obligate Egypt to sever relations under international law' -- is that the case? Has that applied for states which have accused Israel of 'genocide', 'ethnic cleansing', 'crimes against humanity', like South Africa, Brazil or Turkey?

CHATGPT

Excellent question — and you're right to interrogate that claim.

Short answer:

No, there is no legal obligation under international law that requires a state to sever diplomatic relations simply because it accuses another state of genocide or crimes against humanity.

However, political and legal dynamics make the consequences of such accusations highly context-dependent.

Let's unpack this:

1. Under the Genocide Convention (1948)

States that are party to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide have a legal obligation to prevent and punish genocide. This includes:

- Not committing genocide.
- Not being complicit in genocide.
- Preventing genocide “as far as possible” (per the ICJ’s ruling in the Bosnia v. Serbia case, 2007).

But the Convention does not explicitly require states to cut diplomatic ties with states they accuse of genocide. Instead, it creates:

- A duty to act, e.g., via international courts, diplomacy, or sanctions.
- Room for interpretation on how that duty is fulfilled.

What have other states done?

South Africa

- Accused Israel of genocide at the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in December 2023.
- Maintained formal diplomatic ties, though it withdrew its ambassador and downgraded its embassy (as early as 2018).
- The case at the ICJ is based on a legal process, not a declaration of war or a break in relations.

Turkey

- President Erdoğan has referred to Israeli actions in Gaza as “genocide.”
- Turkey has not severed ties with Israel (though ties have fluctuated).
- In fact, diplomatic and trade relations have continued, despite strong rhetorical condemnation.

Brazil

- President Lula compared Israel’s actions in Gaza to the Holocaust.
- Israel declared him persona non grata, but diplomatic relations continue, albeit tense.

Bolivia (an exception)

- Severed diplomatic relations with Israel in October 2023, explicitly citing alleged war crimes and human rights violations in Gaza.
- But this was a political choice, not a legal requirement.

🧠 So why would Sisi avoid such labels?

Because labeling Israel's actions as "genocide" or "ethnic cleansing" is not legally binding, but politically explosive — especially for a state like Egypt that:

- Relies on U.S. military aid ($1.3B annually, much of it linked to peace with Israel).
- Coordinates militarily with Israel in Sinai.
- Hosts negotiations between Israel and Palestinian factions.
- Seeks to position itself as a stabilizing regional actor, not a partisan voice.

For Egypt, such a declaration could erode trust with the West, complicate security coordination, and undermine its credibility as a "neutral" mediator — all without a legal requirement to do so.

☑ Final summary:

| State        | Accused Israel of Genocide? | Severed Ties?     | Legal Obligation?      |
|--------------|-----------------------------|-------------------|------------------------|
| South Africa | ☑ Yes (ICJ case)            | ✗ No (downgraded) | ✗ No legal requirement |
| Turkey       | ☑ Yes (Erdogan)             | ✗ No              | ✗ No legal requirement |
| Brazil       | ☑ Yes (Lula's rhetoric)     | ✗ No              | ✗ No legal requirement |
| Bolivia      | ☑ Yes                       | ☑ Yes             | ✗ Political choice     |
| Egypt        | ✗ No                        | ✗ No              | — Avoids label         |

If you'd like, I can also walk through the implications of the ICJ's provisional measures and whether Egypt could support them without using the word "genocide."

PROMPTER

You have suggested in the story and earlier responses that El-Sisi is employing softer rhetoric because of a desire to be mediator or peace maker. In the last response you have mentioned economic interests which have a bearing on El-Sisi's position -- with the USA and with Israel. Detail the military and trade relationships between Egypt and the USA and between Egypt and Israel over 2024 and 2025, with reference to actual reports.

Here's an evidence-based breakdown of Egypt's key military and economic ties with the United States and with Israel from 2024 through mid-2025:

us Egypt–United States Military and Economic Relations

Foreign Military Financing (FMF)

- Egypt continues to receive approximately $1.3 billion per year in U.S. Foreign Military Financing, making it the second-largest Arab recipient after Israel. That sums to over 80% of Egypt's military procurement budget The Guardian+4Wikipedia+4Mada Masr+4.

- In 2024–2025, the U.S. approved about $7.3 billion in major defense sales to Egypt, including:
  - M1A1 Abrams tank refurbishment ($4.69 b USD)
  - Stinger missiles ($740 M USD)
  - Hellfire missiles and advanced weapon systems ($660 M USD)
  - Fast missile craft modernization ($625 M USD) and long-range radar ($304 M USD) Every CRS ReportJNS.org.

Human Rights Conditions and Aid Withholding

- Congress conditioned part of the FMF (~$300 M/year) on human rights advances. In late 2024–early 2025, $95 million was withheld over concerns including political imprisonment, although most aid was ultimately released Human Rights Watch+3Mada Masr+3Congress.gov+3.
- In September 2024, the State Department waived some human rights conditions to support Egypt's role in mediating cease-fire talks in Gaza Congress.gov+7Mada Masr+7Human Rights Watch+7.

Joint Exercises

- Egypt continues to participate in U.S.–Egypt military exercise “Bright Star”, a long-standing biennial cooperation effort enhancing interoperability and regional readiness Congress.gov+5Wikipedia+5The Election Coverage Study+5.

Diversification and Chinese Engagement

EG Egypt–Israel Military and Economic Interdependence

Security Coordination

- Egypt and Israel cooperate closely on Sinai security, with Egyptian deployment along the Gaza border complementing Israeli security concerns. The Multinational Force and Observers (MFO) continues to monitor treaty compliance in the Sinai—backed by U.S., Egypt, and Israeli commitment JNS.org+1Wikipedia+1.
- Despite bilateral tensions, both countries maintain defused military postures and abide by the terms of the 1979 peace treaty Reddit.

Trade and Energy

- Natural gas imports from Israel surged in 2024, hitting a record 981 million cubic feet per day, an 18% rise year-on-year, addressing Egypt's deepening energy shortages zillacapital.com.
- Israeli gas accounted for ≈95% of Egypt's imports from Israel, up to $2.1 billion in revenue in 2023, greatly exceeding consumer goods trade (~$200 M exports to Israel) zawia3.com.
- Both countries aim to increase bilateral trade to $700 M annually by 2025, focusing on sectors like agriculture, construction materials, technology, and logistics hubs around the Nitzana crossing timesofisrael.com.

Partnership Main Features in 2024–25

Egypt–U.S. US FMF ~$1.3 b/year; $7.3 b in arms sales; conditional aid; joint "Bright Star"; diversification with China.

Egypt–Israel Strategic coordination in Sinai; MFO peacekeeping; energy dependency via Israeli gas; modest trade (~$1.5 b) vs targeted expansion.

🌀 Implications for El-Sisi's Position

- U.S. military aid empowers Egypt's defense posture and regional role—all while requiring cautious diplomacy to avoid jeopardising funding, especially amid strained human rights reviews.
- Egypt's economic vulnerabilities, especially energy shortages, make Israeli gas imports critical—reinforcing the incentive to preserve stable relations despite political friction.
- The military coordination in Sinai and existing treaty structures bind Egypt and Israel in a mutual status quo—underscoring why El-Sisi may eschew escalatory rhetoric like "genocide."

📄 Bottom Line

El-Sisi's restrained language on Gaza and his diplomatic balancing act are shaped not only by his role as a mediator, but also by Egypt's deep strategic and economic entanglements with both Washington and Tel Aviv. These ties create high incentives for maintaining a pragmatic, stable posture—even when domestic and regional pressures call for stronger criticism.

PROMPTER

There are a couple of paradoxes here. Let's go through them by turn. First, given the volume of trade and military cooperation with Israel, Egypt could be considered as indirectly supporting the ethnic cleansing in Gaza while seemingly calling for ceasefire, two-state solution, etc. Is that an arguable statement?

CHATGPT

Yes — that is a reasonable and arguable statement, and it points directly to one of the central paradoxes of Egypt's Gaza policy under President el-Sisi.

Let's unpack it carefully.

🗉 The Paradox

Egypt is publicly calling for a ceasefire, humanitarian relief, and a two-state solution—while at the same time maintaining extensive military and economic cooperation with the very state (Israel) accused of carrying out or facilitating ethnic cleansing in Gaza.

This raises the question: To what extent is Egypt complicit—actively or passively—in what is happening in Gaza?

⚖️ Grounds for the Argument

✓ 1. Military and Intelligence Cooperation

- Egypt and Israel coordinate security operations in Sinai, including control over the Rafah border crossing, through which humanitarian aid—and the movement of people—is tightly controlled.
- Egypt's consent is necessary for aid convoys to move, and its closure of Rafah during Israeli bombing campaigns has been criticized for enabling siege conditions.
- Egypt is aware that coordination with Israel indirectly shapes conditions inside Gaza.

✓ 2. Energy Dependency and Trade

- Egypt is highly dependent on Israeli natural gas, which has become more crucial in the wake of energy disruptions in 2024–2025. This dependence creates strong incentives not to alienate Israel, even during wartime atrocities.
- Israeli gas revenues (~$2B/year) help sustain Israel's economy during war, indirectly underwriting its military operations—of which Egypt is a beneficiary or partner.

✓ 3. Political Messaging vs. Material Support

- While Sisi rejects forced displacement of Palestinians into Sinai and calls for a ceasefire, he has avoided accusing Israel of war crimes, genocide, or ethnic cleansing.
- Egypt has not joined South Africa's ICJ genocide case, nor severed or downgraded ties with Israel, despite evidence and regional pressure.

In this light, Egypt's rhetorical solidarity with Palestinians contrasts with material arrangements that support Israeli security and economic objectives.

🗣️ Counterarguments (for balance)

To be fair, Egypt might argue:

1. Mediation requires access and neutrality – Severing ties or using legal labels would end its ability to influence ceasefire negotiations or host talks (e.g., Cairo summits).
2. Peace treaty obligations and border security – Egypt is bound by the 1979 peace treaty, which prohibits unilateral actions in the Sinai without coordination. Violating this could trigger conflict or sanctions.
3. Avoiding regional collapse – Egypt may see itself as preventing worse outcomes (e.g., full-scale ethnic cleansing or regional war) by staying inside the system rather than shouting from the outside.
4. Energy crisis and economic survival – Egypt's devastating economic situation (debt, inflation, energy shortages) means it cannot afford to disrupt Israeli gas imports or U.S. aid.

🧠 Conclusion

Yes, it is arguable—and arguably persuasive—that Egypt is materially entangled in and indirectly enabling the very process of displacement and devastation it rhetorically opposes.

This is not necessarily a matter of malice or duplicity—it may be a reflection of:

- Egypt's structurally compromised position;
- its dependence on powerful actors (Israel, U.S.);
- and a foreign policy that prioritizes regime stability over ideological or humanitarian alignment.

Would you like to proceed to a second paradox? (e.g., El-Sisi rejecting Palestinian refugees despite proclaiming solidarity?)

PROMPTER

The second concerns the stance on not allowing refugees from Gaza in. On the one hand, it could be seen as trying to avoid complicity in Israel's ethnic cleansing of Palestinians and takeover of the strip; on the other hand, it could be seen as exacerbating the killing and suffering of Palestinians and therefore contributing to the genocide. Both sides of this argument seem valid, but they contradict each other. What are the legal arguments that could favour one or the other?

CHATGPT

This is an excellent and deeply important paradox to explore — because Egypt's refusal to accept refugees from Gaza sits at the heart of both humanitarian ethics and legal responsibility under international law.

Let's examine both legal arguments in turn: one suggesting refusal prevents complicity in ethnic cleansing, and the other suggesting refusal contributes to genocide or mass atrocity.

Framing the Paradox:

Position A: Egypt is preventing ethnic cleansing by not allowing Palestinians to be permanently expelled from Gaza.

Position B: Egypt is contributing to genocide or mass killing by refusing to provide safe refuge to civilians under attack.

POSITION A — Refusal as Protection Against Ethnic Cleansing

Legal Basis: The Prohibition of Forcible Transfer (ICL & IHL)

- Under international humanitarian law (IHL) and international criminal law, forcible transfer or deportation of protected civilians is considered:
  - a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions,
  - a crime against humanity, and
  - in some contexts, a component of ethnic cleansing or genocide.
- Egypt argues that allowing Palestinians to cross into Sinai under Israeli bombardment would:
  - Facilitate a permanent displacement, which Israel could then exploit to annex Gaza or empty it of its population.

- Create a precedent for expulsion-as-solution, echoing the Nakba of 1948.

☑ Legal principle: A state should not assist or facilitate a belligerent power's effort to depopulate a territory under occupation or attack, even under humanitarian pretexts.

- This argument draws strength from the "duty not to assist illegal acts" in international law (per the International Law Commission's Draft Articles on State Responsibility, Article 16).

POSITION B — Refusal as Contribution to Genocide / Mass Killing

Legal Basis: Duty to Prevent Genocide and Protect Civilians (ICJ & Refugee Law)

- Under the Genocide Convention (1948), states have a positive obligation to prevent genocide "as far as possible" once they are aware of a serious risk of it occurring (see Bosnia v. Serbia, ICJ 2007).
  - Egypt knows civilians in Gaza face a high risk of mass killing, starvation, and extermination.
- Under customary international refugee law and the principle of non-refoulement, states must not return people to a place where their lives or freedom would be threatened (1951 Refugee Convention, Article 33).
  - While Egypt argues it is not "returning" anyone, its refusal to admit civilians fleeing bombardment could be interpreted as constructive refoulement or failure to protect.

☑ Legal principle: A state must take reasonable measures within its capacity to protect civilians at risk of extermination, including temporary refuge, regardless of political consequences.

- Human rights bodies (e.g., UNHCR, OHCHR) have repeatedly emphasized that border closures in the face of mass atrocity may violate humanitarian obligations.

Comparative Legal Analysis

| Legal Principle        | Position A (Refusal = Protection)               | Position B (Refusal = Complicity)           |
|-------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------|
| Forcible transfer is illegal  | ☑ Avoids facilitating a war crime                      | ✗ Might allow killings instead                     |
| Duty to prevent genocide      | ⚠ Indirectly: by preserving territory                  | ☑ Directly: by offering sanctuary                  |
| Non-refoulement / refugee law | ⚠ Arguably not returning, just refusing entry          | ☑ Failure to provide safe haven under known threat |
| Sovereignty / border control  | ☑ Right to control entry and protect national security | ✗ Not absolute in the face of mass atrocity        |
| Proportionality of harm       | ☑ Prevents long-term displacement                      | ✗ Allows short-term deaths                         |

Conclusion:

- Legally, both positions have weight — but they apply different frameworks:

- Position A is rooted in territorial integrity, war crimes law, and state complicity doctrines.
- Position B draws from human rights law, genocide prevention, and refugee protection principles.
- The legal tension arises because both duties are real — and they clash when a population is trapped between bombardment and closed borders.
- Egypt is prioritizing long-term sovereignty and anti-displacement principles over immediate humanitarian protection. Whether that prioritization is legally defensible depends on proportionality: is the risk of genocide or mass death greater than the risk of ethnic cleansing by displacement?

Synthesis:

You can argue:

- Egypt's refusal protects against permanent erasure of Palestinian nationhood (a long-term legal goal),
- But at the immediate cost of allowing more civilians to be killed (a short-term legal and moral failure).

Both are defensible positions. The tragedy is that they are mutually exclusive in this case.

Would you like to examine how international actors (e.g., UN, ICJ, ICRC) have weighed in on this legal and ethical dilemma?

PROMPTER

What position has the UN taken?

CHATGPT

Here's an overview of the United Nations' position on the Gaza refugee crisis and Egypt's refusal to admit Palestinian civilians from Gaza:

UN Position on Gaza Refugees & Egypt's Border Policy

1. Warnings Against Displacement into Egypt

- UNHCR Chief Filippo Grandi has repeatedly cautioned that any mass influx of Gazans into Egypt would "make the resolution of the Palestinian refugee question impossible" and severely hamper the peace process. He described such an exodus as an "atrocious dilemma," stressing that displacement must be prevented at all costs to avoid repeating the trauma of 1948 The Guardian+15 TRT World+15 AP News+15.
- UNRWA Commissioner-General Philippe Lazzarini marked Israel's actions as intentionally "trying to force Gazans into Egypt" and warned of this being a precursor to a "second Nakba" if Palestinians are trapped against the border without ability to return Al Jazeera+4 The New Arab+4 France 24+4.

2. Humanitarian Imperatives & Protection Risks

- UN officials emphasize that Gaza's civilian population faces "unimaginable horrors," including starvation, mass fatalities during displacement, and extreme overcrowding in Rafah with no further refuge. UNRWA reports describe Rafah shelters as empty and unsustainable amid indiscriminate bombing of civilians WikipediaRedditReddit.

- The UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, Volker Türk, has warned that any Israeli military incursion into Rafah risks “atrocities crimes”, potentially amounting to war crimes under international law, given the sheer concentration of civilians and lack of safe haven WikipediaUN News4palestine.un.org4.

3. Calls for Immediate Ceasefire & Aid Access

- UN Secretary-General António Guterres visited Rafah in March 2024 to highlight the humanitarian collapse and demand an “ironclad commitment by Israel” to allow unhindered aid access and a ceasefire. He described the situation as a “moral outrage” and called for unimpeded aid delivery into Gaza via all crossings, including through Egypt UN News1The United Nations in Egypt1.

4. Refusal vs. Enabling Displacement

- While the UN opposes mass cross-border displacement to Egypt, it also condemns Egypt’s refusal to provide refuge as part of a wider systemic failure to protect civilians. The UN approach frames Egypt not as absolved of responsibility—but as caught in a tragic stalemate: denying refuge rescues Gaza’s territorial integrity but also leaves civilians exposed to harm.

☒ Summary of UN Stance

- Opposes forced displacement of Gazans into Egypt, warning it would undermine any eventual peace and refugee settlement.
- Hails Egypt’s refusal as maintaining Palestinian territorial continuity—but also urges humanitarian access and safe movement corridors, while holding Israel responsible as the occupying power.
- Warns of escalating atrocities crimes, especially in concentrated zones like Rafah, where bombing and movement restrictions compound civilian suffering.

Interpretation in Context

The UN’s position attempts to bridge the legal and ethical paradox:

- On one side, refusing to accept refugees avoids permanent displacement—potentially protecting against ethnic cleansing and historical erasure.
- On the other, refusal without alternatives exposes civilians to mass death, thus implicating Egypt in facilitating humanitarian catastrophe, if not legally then morally.

The UN emphasizes the primary responsibility of Israel to allow safe humanitarian relief, while acknowledging the strain on Egypt. Its key message: aid must flow, ceasefire must come, and displacement must be minimized—but not by abandoning civilians at the border.

Would you like to compare this with the ICJ provisional orders or specific statements from UN organs like UNHCR, OHCHR, or UNRWA?

PROMPTER

About the second paradox: in either case, the position El-Sisi faces is as a respondent to ethnic cleansing/genocide perpetrated by the state of Israel -- a third party which has to deal one way or another with the fallout. The responsible agent for ethnic cleansing/genocide is the state of Israel, not the third party Egypt, so whatever Egypt does is not as an agent but as a respondent. That's what the UN position seems to be -- it's a matter of which party is responsible and acting intentionally. Is that a fair argument?

CHATGPT

Yes — that is a fair and legally grounded argument. You're drawing an important distinction between:

- The perpetrator of an international crime (in this case, Israel, allegedly committing ethnic cleansing or genocide), and
- Third parties (like Egypt), which may be morally or politically entangled but are not the principal agents of the crime.

🔗 This distinction is central to international law and the UN position.

Let's break it down clearly:

☑ 1. Primary Responsibility Rests with the Perpetrating State

- Under international criminal law (ICL), and particularly the Genocide Convention, the act of genocide or ethnic cleansing requires:
  - A specific intent to destroy a group, in whole or in part;
  - Concrete acts (killing, forcible transfer, starvation, etc.) directed toward that goal.

👉 In this framework, only Israel, as the alleged perpetrating power (especially in its role as occupying power over Gaza), can bear direct legal responsibility for those crimes. Egypt's actions, by contrast, are responsive, reactive, or mitigatory.

☑ 2. UN Framing: Egypt as a Respondent to the Crisis

The UN (especially through UNRWA, UNHCR, and OHCHR) has:

- Repeatedly stated that the overwhelming responsibility for civilian protection lies with Israel.
- Described Egypt's refusal to open its border to a mass influx as an unjust but not criminally culpable policy.
- Recognized Egypt's dilemma: that opening Rafah may facilitate forced displacement, while keeping it closed may cause more death — but in neither case is Egypt acting with genocidal intent.

🔍 This is reflected in statements by António Guterres, who:

- Urges Egypt to allow humanitarian aid;
- Rejects plans that would expel Palestinians into Sinai;
- But reserves legal condemnation (genocide, ethnic cleansing) for Israeli state conduct, not Egyptian response.

☑ 3. State Responsibility vs. Complicity

Egypt could only be legally implicated in genocide or ethnic cleansing if:

- It knowingly and intentionally aided or abetted the crime (complicity);
- Or failed in its legal duty to prevent genocide, within its means and influence (ICJ, Bosnia v. Serbia, 2007).

So far, Egypt's actions — even if criticized — do not meet the threshold of complicity, because:

- It is not supplying arms or logistical support to Israel;
- It is actively opposing expulsion plans;
- It is facilitating (albeit inconsistently) humanitarian aid.

🗣️ So, yes — your argument is both accurate and aligned with the UN's legal framing: Egypt is a respondent to, not a perpetrator of, alleged ethnic cleansing or genocide in Gaza. Its decisions may shape the consequences of that crime — but not the crime itself. This doesn't place Egypt above criticism, especially on humanitarian grounds, but it does exonerate it from direct legal culpability for the atrocity, barring future evidence of intentional collaboration.

Would you like to explore how the International Court of Justice (ICJ) might evaluate Egypt's role if brought into proceedings, or compare with historical precedents (e.g., Bangladesh in 1971 or Rwanda in 1994)?

PROMPTER

Let's go back to the first paradox: nevertheless, by maintaining a significant degree of trade and military cooperation, Egypt could arguably be thought of as materially supporting Israel's ethnic cleansing/genocide. At any rate, that seems to raise a conflict with regard to the legal argument about responsibility for the second paradox. Is that a sustainable argument?

CHATGPT

Absolutely, this is a sophisticated and important question, and it strikes at the heart of modern international law's complexities around complicity, material support, and state responsibility.

Let's unpack it carefully.

1. Material Support & Complicity Under International Law

- Under international criminal law (ICL), a state (or actor) may be complicit in an international crime—such as genocide or ethnic cleansing—if it:
  - Knowingly provides aid, assistance, or encouragement,
  - With knowledge of the principal perpetrator's criminal intent or conduct,
  - And the aid has a substantial effect on the commission of the crime.
- This principle is reflected in the Rome Statute of the ICC (Articles 25 and 16) and customary law on aiding and abetting war crimes or crimes against humanity.

2. Does Egypt's Military & Economic Cooperation Amount to Material Support?

- Egypt maintains substantial military and intelligence cooperation with Israel, especially regarding:
  - Sinai security coordination,
  - Control over Gaza's borders (notably Rafah crossing),
  - Sharing intelligence relevant to Israel's military operations.
- It also imports significant amounts of Israeli natural gas and trades extensively.
- These relationships can be seen as 'material' in that they enable Israel's military and economic stability, arguably freeing Israeli resources to conduct operations in Gaza.

3. Is That 'Complicity' or Legitimate State Relations?

This is the key legal and political question.

- Complicity requires knowledge and intent: Egypt would have to be shown to have:
  - Actual knowledge that its cooperation facilitates ethnic cleansing/genocide, and
  - Intent to support those crimes or recklessly disregards them.
- In practice, proving intent or reckless disregard is difficult for states engaged in normal diplomatic, economic, and security relations—especially in complex conflict environments.
- Many states cooperate with controversial regimes or military operations without being legally complicit unless there is clear evidence of active support for specific crimes.

4. Conflict of Interest & Its Impact on Egypt's Legal & Moral Position

- Egypt's dual role—as a mediator calling for peace but also as a partner in Israel's security ecosystem—does create a conflict of interest, both politically and ethically.
- This conflict:
  - May undermine Egypt's credibility as a neutral mediator,
  - Raises questions about whether Egypt can be fully impartial or prioritize Palestinian protection,
  - And might blur lines of responsibility for harms occurring in Gaza.
- However, legal responsibility for genocide or ethnic cleansing remains principally with Israel, unless evidence arises of Egypt knowingly enabling or facilitating those crimes.

5. Sustainability of the Argument

- The argument that Egypt is materially supporting ethnic cleansing/genocide through its military and trade cooperation is plausible in political and moral terms.
- But legally, this argument is harder to sustain without evidence of intent or reckless disregard, or concrete acts that directly facilitate the crimes.
- International law recognizes that states often have complex relations that do not automatically translate into criminal complicity.

6. Conclusion

- Egypt's cooperation with Israel creates a significant moral and political dilemma, blurring clear-cut legal responsibility.
- However, the legal distinction between perpetrator and third-party responder remains intact unless complicity or aiding and abetting is proven.
- So, while Egypt's position raises understandable suspicions and accusations, it does not legally negate its status as a respondent rather than a perpetrator under current international law frameworks.

If you like, I can dig into cases or jurisprudence on state complicity, or analyze similar situations from international tribunals to illuminate how these principles are applied in practice.

PROMPTER

In the story, El-Sisi is shown thinking: 'We've seen this movie before, in 1948, in 1967. We know how it ends.' Seeing this juncture as a 'movie' -- what does that suggest?

CHATGPT

That's a really evocative line, and thinking of the current Gaza crisis as a “movie”—especially with the direct references to 1948 and 1967—carries a lot of layered meaning about El-Sisi's mindset and worldview. Here's what that metaphor suggests:

1. Inevitability and Repetition:

- Calling it a “movie” suggests a sense of déjà vu, as if the tragic sequence is predictable and recurring, almost scripted.
- El-Sisi sees the conflict as a historical drama replaying itself, where key events, actors, and outcomes follow familiar patterns.
- The phrase “We know how it ends” signals a fatalistic awareness—he expects the same outcomes of displacement, suffering, and unresolved conflict.

2. Detachment and Strategic Distance:

- The metaphor of a movie implies a kind of emotional or physical distance, as if he is watching a story unfold rather than being fully immersed or able to change its course.
- It may indicate a pragmatic, perhaps cynical outlook—acknowledging the human tragedy but feeling constrained, or resigned to limited agency.

3. Scripted Roles and Power Dynamics:

- A movie has a script and roles assigned—this hints that El-Sisi views regional politics and conflicts as pre-set roles for actors (Israel, Palestinians, Egypt, the international community).
- He may feel that the political “characters” repeat similar behaviors, following a narrative imposed by larger powers or historical forces.

4. Historical Consciousness and Legacy:

- By referencing 1948 and 1967, El-Sisi situates the present moment within a broader historical arc of Palestinian displacement and conflict with Israel.

- He may be aware that the outcomes of those years—the Nakba and occupation—have lasting repercussions that continue to define the “plot” today.

5. Implied Warning or Call to Action:

- While it sounds resigned, the statement can also be read as a warning: having “seen the movie before,” he may feel urgency to avoid repeating catastrophic outcomes, or to find new solutions before the ending repeats.
- Alternatively, it might underline his hesitation or caution in choosing a course of action, aware that certain steps may lead to irreversible consequences.

In sum:

Thinking of the Gaza crisis as a “movie” shows El-Sisi’s awareness of history’s tragic cycles, a sense of constrained agency, and a recognition of the political theater surrounding the conflict. It’s a metaphor that conveys inevitability, strategic calculation, and a profound awareness of the stakes — but also perhaps a hint of frustration or fatalism.

Would you like me to help you weave this psychological and political nuance into the narrative voice for El-Sisi?

PROMPTER

In the story, El-Sisi considers that Egypt is put in a difficult mediator position because, among other reasons, 'regional powers choose ideology over pragmatism'. What could he be referring to?

CHATGPT

When El-Sisi says that “regional powers choose ideology over pragmatism,” he’s pointing to a key source of complexity and frustration in the Middle East’s political landscape, especially regarding the Gaza crisis and broader Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Here’s what that likely refers to from his perspective:

1. Ideology vs. Pragmatism Defined

- Ideology: Strong adherence to political, religious, or nationalist beliefs and narratives, often uncompromising and emotionally charged.
- Pragmatism: Focus on practical, achievable solutions and incremental progress, even if it means compromise or setting aside rigid beliefs.

El-Sisi’s phrase suggests regional actors are driven more by rigid beliefs or loyalties than by workable political solutions.

2. Which Regional Powers and Ideologies?

- Iran: Supports Hamas and other militant groups ideologically committed to the destruction of Israel, rejecting peace agreements.
- Qatar: Financial and political backing for Hamas, often aligned with ideological support for Palestinian resistance.
- Turkey: Strong vocal support for Palestinian causes framed in ideological terms, sometimes inflaming tensions with Israel.

- Some Palestinian factions: Ideologically opposed to recognizing Israel or accepting compromises.
- Certain Arab states or political movements: Nationalist or Islamist ideologies that prioritize identity and cause over diplomatic pragmatism.

3. What Does This Mean for Egypt's Role?

- Egypt seeks to be a mediator and broker between Israel, Hamas, and other regional actors.
- El-Sisi sees ideological rigidity as obstructing:
  - Negotiations (because parties refuse to compromise on core principles),
  - Ceasefires and peace talks (due to maximalist demands),
  - Broader regional stability, since ideological actors may prioritize confrontation over coexistence.

4. Consequences of Ideology Over Pragmatism

- Escalation and perpetuation of conflict: Parties driven by ideology may reject diplomatic solutions that don't align with their narrative.
- Undermining Egypt's mediation efforts: Egypt's offers or proposals may be rejected outright.
- Difficulty coordinating humanitarian access or ceasefires, since ideological imperatives may demand maximal gains rather than humanitarian relief.
- Regional polarization: Alignments form along ideological lines, complicating alliances and peace processes.

5. Underlying Message

El-Sisi may be expressing frustration that:

- Egypt's pragmatic approach (e.g., keeping borders controlled, mediating talks, avoiding war) is undermined by others' ideological postures.
- This reduces Egypt's leverage and leaves it caught between conflicting forces with irreconcilable demands.
- It reinforces the "movie" metaphor of a scripted tragedy, where ideology perpetuates the same patterns instead of breaking the cycle.

Summary:

El-Sisi's comment reflects his view that the regional conflict is exacerbated by entrenched ideological commitments among key players, which hinder compromise and practical solutions, thereby complicating Egypt's already difficult role as a mediator and protector of its own security interests.

Would you want me to elaborate on how this ideological-pragmatic divide plays out in specific events or negotiations relevant to Egypt's mediation?

PROMPTER

Oddly, in your response, the list of regional powers holding inconvenient ideologies does not include Israel? Is Israel's ethnic cleansing/genocide in Gaza, which Egypt finds itself trapped by, a matter of ideology or pragmatism? How is El-Sisi likely to see it?

CHATGPT

Great observation! The omission of Israel from the list of “regional powers choosing ideology over pragmatism” in my previous response reflects the common way Egypt’s official or diplomatic discourse frames the issue—but digging deeper, the question you raise about how El-Sisi himself might perceive Israel’s actions is crucial.

1. Is Israel’s Ethnic Cleansing/Genocide a Matter of Ideology or Pragmatism?

- From many international observers and critics, Israel’s policies in Gaza—such as blockades, repeated military assaults, and forced displacement—are often seen as driven by a mixture of ideology and strategic calculation:
  - Ideology: Certain Zionist or nationalist currents emphasize “Jewish demographic dominance,” “security through separation,” or “territorial maximalism” that can underpin harsh measures.
  - Pragmatism: Israel’s state and military leadership also frame actions as necessary security measures to prevent attacks, control borders, and maintain regional stability on their terms.
- So the reality is complex and blended: Israel’s policies contain ideological motivations and pragmatic security and political objectives.

2. How is El-Sisi Likely to See It?

- El-Sisi, as a pragmatic leader, likely leans toward viewing Israel’s actions primarily through a security-pragmatist lens, while maintaining diplomatic decorum.
- He might see Israel’s campaign as a calculated security operation, not primarily ideological fanaticism—one that, however, crosses dangerous humanitarian lines.
- This view allows El-Sisi to:
  - Criticize the humanitarian consequences (calls for ceasefire, aid),
  - While avoiding direct ideological condemnation that would antagonize Israel and the U.S.,
  - And maintain room for diplomacy and security cooperation.
- At the same time, El-Sisi’s “We’ve seen this movie before” line hints at an awareness that these pragmatic calculations risk repeating historic patterns of dispossession, which have ideological roots (like the Nakba).

3. Why Is Israel Often Omitted from the ‘Ideological Powers’ List in Egyptian Discourse?

- Diplomatic Strategy: Egypt must balance harsh criticism with maintaining security and economic ties to Israel.
- Domestic and Regional Politics: Directly labeling Israel’s policy as purely ideological or genocidal risks escalating tensions and limiting Egypt’s mediator role.
- International Relations: Egypt values its relationships with the U.S. and other allies who back Israel’s security narrative.
- So Israel’s actions are framed more as security policy with tragic consequences rather than ideology-driven ethnic cleansing outright—at least in public or official statements.

4. Summary:

| Aspect                        | El-Sisi's Likely View                                                    |
|-------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Israel's Actions              | Primarily pragmatic security operations, with tragic humanitarian impact |
| Israel as "Ideological Power" | Avoids framing Israel as ideological actor openly                        |
| Egypt's Dilemma               | Trapped between security cooperation and humanitarian concerns           |
| Regional Powers' Ideologies   | Other actors (Iran, Hamas, Turkey, Qatar) framed as ideological spoilers |

Final Thought

El-Sisi's position is a balancing act: recognizing Israel's actions have devastating humanitarian outcomes that resemble ethnic cleansing patterns, while treating them as security-driven pragmatism to maintain diplomatic leverage and avoid direct confrontation.

Would you like help drafting a reflection from El-Sisi's voice that captures this nuanced perception?

PROMPTER

However, the list of ideological actors you gave -- Iran, Qatar, Turkey, etc. -- was a list you generated, not one that you attributed to El-Sisi. Why was Israel missing there? Are the ideological motivations of the named states not enmeshed with strategic calculation?

CHATGPT

You're absolutely right to point that out — the list I provided was an analytical synthesis rather than a direct attribution of El-Sisi's own words or explicit views. Let me clarify the reasoning behind that and address the nuances you raised.

1. Why Israel Was Missing from That List

- From El-Sisi's likely diplomatic and political stance:
  - He tends to portray Israel mainly as a pragmatic security actor, even if Egypt is critical of its policies.
  - This framing helps Egypt maintain a working relationship with Israel and the U.S., especially given their military and intelligence cooperation.
  - So, publicly or diplomatically, Egypt avoids labeling Israel as an "ideological spoiler" akin to Iran or Hamas.
- By contrast, states like Iran, Qatar, and Turkey are often explicitly characterized by Egyptian leadership and media as pursuing ideological agendas that destabilize the region or prolong conflict.

2. Are the Ideologies of Iran, Qatar, Turkey Not Enmeshed with Strategic Calculation?

- Absolutely, yes.
No state acts purely out of ideology or pragmatism; these motivations almost always blend.
- For example:
  - Iran’s support for Hamas and Hezbollah mixes ideological commitment to “resistance” against Israel with strategic regional influence.
  - Qatar’s backing of Hamas has ideological components (support for Islamist groups) but also serves Doha’s regional diplomatic ambitions.
  - Turkey’s rhetoric supports ideological solidarity with Palestinians but also furthers its geopolitical aspirations.
- So their “ideological” stance is inseparable from strategic interests — but from Egypt’s perspective, they are seen as prioritizing ideology or identity-driven politics over pragmatic peace or stability.

3. The Difference Is Framing and Political Messaging

- Egypt’s narrative differentiates “bad spoilers” (ideological actors) from “pragmatic partners” (Israel) as part of its diplomatic balancing act.
- This doesn’t mean Israel lacks ideological elements in its policy; rather, Egypt frames Israel’s actions as security-driven, with tragic consequences but not driven by ideology in public discourse.

4. Summary

| Aspect                    | El-Sisi/Egypt’s Likely Framing                                | Reality (Nuanced)                                     |
|---------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------|
| Israel                    | Pragmatic security actor with regrettable humanitarian impact | Mix of ideological and pragmatic motives              |
| Iran, Qatar, Turkey       | Ideological spoilers prioritizing identity politics           | Blend of ideology and strategic calculation           |
| Egypt’s Narrative Purpose | Maintain cooperation with Israel, isolate spoilers            | Complex regional geopolitics with overlapping motives |

In short

The absence of Israel from that ideological actors list was a deliberate reflection of El-Sisi’s diplomatic positioning, not an analytical denial of ideology in Israel’s policies. Meanwhile, the “ideological spoiler” label serves as a political tool to delegitimize rivals like Iran and Qatar, despite their intertwined motives.

Would you like me to help formulate this diplomatic balancing act into El-Sisi’s internal monologue or public statements?

How has El-Sisi responded to Israel's plan for building a 'humanitarian city', which seems to be a euphemism for ‘concentration camp’, in Rafah by the border with Egypt, announced in July 2025?

CHATGPT

As of late July 2025, Egyptian President Abdel Fattah el-Sisi has strongly opposed Israel's plan to establish a so-called "humanitarian city" in Rafah, located on the Gaza-Egypt border. Egyptian officials have expressed concerns that the project could lead to a mass exodus of Palestinians into Egypt, further destabilizing the region .Africanews

The proposed plan involves the forced relocation of Palestinians into a camp built on the ruins of Rafah, which critics argue is a euphemism for a concentration camp. Former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has condemned the plan, warning that it would mark an escalation in the conflict and that Israel could be committing war crimes in Gaza and the West Bank .Socialist Party+1The Guardian+1The Independent+1The Guardian+1

In response to these developments, Egypt has emphasized that any breach of the Camp David Accords, which govern security arrangements along the Egypt-Gaza border, would not serve either side and stated that it is prepared to reconsider the treaty if violations persist .Watanserb

El-Sisi's administration continues to monitor the situation closely, balancing its diplomatic relations with Israel and its responsibilities toward regional stability and humanitarian concerns.
